Perhaps there is hardly any book of the kind now in the English language, which gives so much more information in fewer words, and in a more interesting manner, than the present work. It is a book which every student of the classical languages should have.

For students of the classical languages, it is a book which should be in every library. It gives a complete and accurate account of the history, geography, and natural history of the ancient world, and is a book which every student of the
classical languages should have.

From the same source as above, taken at West Kensington, near Highgate. The plant grows in a wet, marshy place.
 The leaves are large and narrow, and are very much like those of the Sparganium angustifolium. The leaves are very narrow, and are very much like those of the Sparganium.
